In the series are many indefinite references to "the college of Manila," in which it is not certain whether S. Ignacio or S. José is meant. Accordingly, all not specifically referring to S. José are placed under S. Ignacio. Sometimes, also, the term "college" is used for "residence" (see VOL. XI, p. 195), or convent, especially when referring to Jesuit houses in the provinces; in such cases, the context must decide the exact meaning of the term.*

*Regarding "gold de Tepuzque," an expression used frequently in this series, we take the following from Bancroft's Mexico, ii, p. 7: "Another measure to relieve the financial strait was to lower the standard of gold by three carats, so as to counteract the rapacity of the traders; but the latter raised their prices even more than enough to cover the difference, and the soldiers remained the losers. This gold, known as Tepuzque, the native name for copper, fell more and more into discredit as unprincipled persons added to the alloy, and some years later it was withdrawn from circulation in payment of certain dues and fines. The name of tepuzque lingered in the vocabulary, however, and was applied also to persons and things having a false gloss. In Guanajuato silver of inferior standard is still called plata de tepuzcos."

*This topic is properly treated under "Commerce," as above indicated; allusion to it is made here because the Manila-Acapulco trade was a monopoly granted by the crown to the Philippine colony as a whole, and placed under the supervision of the governor and treasury officials at Manila, thus assuming a quasi-governmental aspect. A similar monopoly of trade was afterward granted to the Compañía de Filipinas, q.v. under Commerce: Trading companies.
